Jerry S. Wilson, Senior Vice President of The Coca-Cola Company

Linda Morris introduced our speaker, Jerry S. Wilson, Sr. VP Coca-Cola Company.

Mr. Wilson presented an engaging program based on the concept of extending proven product branding principles to personal branding. In other words, "if you are a brand, what would we change" from those product branding concepts that he's applied successfully in his career with Volkswagen, McDonald's, and Coca-Cola.

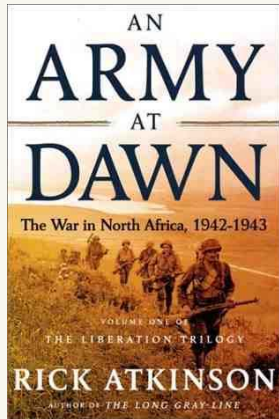

Three key principles apply equally well whether dealing with products or for individuals. First, the principle of Focus and Sacrifice is important. Focus was explained by example with the Zappos company whose brand was: "passion, purpose, profit." Mr. Wilson reminded us of Zappos' success and recent purchase of the company by Amazon for $1.2 billion dollars. Quite the handsome profit for the creators of the Zappos brand! He further explained that in order to develop the necessary focus, you must decide who your target audience is. Who and what matters most to us as individuals? Family, work identity and ethic are areas of passion for people and identify our target audience.

It is also important that your brand be concise and meaningful to you and those you seek to reach. Passions are brandable in this way. Secondly, it is important to communicate your brand with consistency. He further shared that everything communicates and that "Hope is not a winning strategy." It takes thoughtful consideration of your strengths, goals, and desires to create a clear personal brand.

Lastly, authenticity matters. By way of example, he related the success of McDonald's food not only for the brand of fast food that is: fresh, quickly prepared, and cheap, but that if McDonald's did not deliver on those promises, customers would be dissatisfied and leave.

Similarly, as individuals, we must deliver on our promise. If our brand is not who we are and who we deliver to our family and community, it would not be successful. Mr. Wilson's presentation certainly delivered on his brand of Passion, Communication, and Authenticity.

Jerry S. Wilson

In honor of Mr. Wilson's program the Rotary Club purchased his book, "Managing Brand You", for donation to the DeKalb Library system.

The meeting was then adjourned.
